“The first thing it takes, for the eradication of poverty to be an integral objective of all policies and to exist with a sustainable outcome, would be to first assign a policy maker to sit in and live amongst the poverty-stricken people for just one full day in their communities. To hear their stories is one thing, but to live their stories that affects them daily first hand is the best hands on training and experience ever. With this encounter, a proper report can be conducted and shared with other policy makers. From this point the proper raw materials, food supplies, clothing, shelter and education system can be figured out in a budget and assigned to the poverty areas in need. At this point we must also train the poverty people in our world to learn how to do for self and have self determination to continue to sustain their own environments for generations to come. To make this all possible we must all become more proactive in a sense. This includes policy makers, NGO's etc. If we just put forward a little more effort, we can definitely succeed in making our hopes and dreams of the eradication of poverty a reality. We must help the poverty and begin to respect those who are also indigenous peoples to our lands.”
